

As I step into the role of the school head in SICA S. S. School No.2, with reopening of the new session; I look at the associated community with a fresh start filled with brand new opportunities to learn, grow, and achieve. The new era of education is not just about textbooks, assignments, and exams. It is about building character, nurturing values, and acquiring multiple skills. Newer generations have to step out of their comfort zones, embrace new challenges as stepping stones. Students will have to be more conscious and sensitive in their ways of dealing with fellow beings and natural habitat.

Education is a partnership between family, school and community and that by everyone working together, children can achieve their social and academic potential and become good citizens, leading happy and rewarding lives when they are ready to leave their nest. Parents and guardians have taken best of their measures ensuring that children have the best chance in life. Therefore, setting higher benchmarks to match the future expectations, we as educators are continuously designing variety of techniques to stimulate the learners.

Children need opportunities to explore and experience the world - learning is best when it is meaningful, inspirational and creative. During the Foundation Stage much learning will be child-led and although a more formal curriculum will begin in Year 1, child-centered learning will still be at the heart of the school system throughout the students' time here.

Our ethos at school is one of respect for individuals and we believe that everyone should be valued for who they are. To be confident, children need to develop a real sense of their strength and weakness that would help them create a better self. We all have different talents and abilities and these need to be nurtured and celebrated so we can become the best possible version of ourselves.
